To the Editor.

My idea of managing a husband is not to "manage" him.

A man objects to being managed, as a rule, and it is so easy to make one's husband happy, if the wife would only see it in that light. I am a widow now, but in the seven years of my happy married life there was not one cross word between my husband and myself.

Be Quiet, but Firm.

It is not necessary to be a slave to a man. There are two extremes which the majority of women go to; one, working and worrying their lives away ; the other, taking things to easily.

A man wants a companion. Make a home cheerful; have his things where he can lay his hands on them; have his meals on time, and if you have any grievances and worries don't blurt them out as he comes in the door, tired out from business. Wait until he is rested after a good dinner. You will find he will be a good listener and sympathizer then, perhaps thaw out and teil you his mountain of business troubles. You will find yourself giving him advice and your moienil of trouble will insappear.

Let a wife be quiet and firm about her rights. She will find that her husband will give in to her better judgment. Mrs. V.
